

Obama: More post-traumatic stress help for vets

July 12 2010, By JULIE PACE , Associated Press Writer

In this Dec. 21, 2009, file photo President Barack Obama with Veterans Affairs Secretary Eric Shinseki, left, makes a statement in the Diplomatic Reception Room of the White House in Washington. Obama in his weekly radio and online address Saturday, July 10, 2010, said the government is taking "a long overdue step" to make it easier for veterans with post-traumatic stress disorder to receive federal benefits. The changes, which will be announced Monday, July 11, by Shinseki, will fulfill "a solemn responsibility to provide our veterans and wounded warriors with the care and benefits they've earned when they come home," he said. (AP Photo/Susan Walsh)

(AP) -- The government is taking what President Barack Obama calls "a long overdue step" to aid veterans with post-traumatic stress disorder, making it easier for them to receive federal benefits.

The changes that Veteran Affairs Secretary Eric Shinseki will announce Monday fulfill "a solemn responsibility to provide our veterans and wounded warriors with the care and benefits they've earned when they come home," Obama said in his weekly radio and online address Saturday.

The new rules will apply not only to veterans of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, but also those who served in previous conflicts.

No longer will veterans have to prove what caused their illness. Instead, they would have to show that the conditions surrounding the time and place of their service could have contributed to their illness.

"I don't think our troops on the battlefield should have to take notes to keep for a claims application," the president said. "And I've met enough veterans to know that you don't have to engage in a firefight to endure the trauma of war."

Veterans advocates and some lawmakers have argued that it sometimes could be impossible for veterans to find records of a firefight or bomb blast.

They also have contended that the old rules ignored other causes of PTSD, such as fearing a traumatic event even if it doesn't occur. That could discriminate against female troops prohibited from serving on front lines and against other service members who don't experience combat directly.

"This is a long overdue step," Obama said. "It's a step that proves America will always be here for our veterans, just as they've been there for us. We won't let them down. We take care of our own."

A study last year by the RAND Corp. think tank estimated that nearly 20 percent of returning veterans, or 300,000, have symptoms of PTSD or major depression.

A senior official at the Department of Veterans Affairs said the agency doesn't expect the number of veterans receiving benefits for PTSD to rise dramatically, as most veterans with legitimate applications for benefits do eventually get claims. The goal is simply to make the claims process less cumbersome and time-consuming, said the official, who would speak only on condition of anonymity ahead of the VA's announcement.

More information: Department of Veterans Affairs:
<http://www.ptsd.va.gov/>

©2010 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

Citation: Obama: More post-traumatic stress help for vets (2010, July 12) retrieved 26 April 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2010-07-obama-post-traumatic-stress-vets.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
--