

Medicare, medicaid would keep running if US government shuts down

September 30 2013, by Dennis Thompson, Healthday Reporter

But other programs, such as disease surveillance, food and drug inspections, could be curtailed, according to contingency plans.

(HealthDay)—Medicare and Medicaid recipients and veterans will continue to receive health-care benefits if the federal government shuts down on Tuesday, U.S. officials said Monday.

The shutdown also won't stop Tuesday's introduction of the health insurance exchanges that are a foundation of the Affordable Care Act. The law, also known as Obamacare, is ground zero in the budget battle on Capitol Hill that is leading to the shutdown threat.

However, a number of programs important to public health will be disrupted if no Congressional compromise is reached before midnight tonight. They include infectious disease surveillance, inspections of food and drug manufacturers, and monitoring of imported foods and drugs, government officials said.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) expects to furlough 52 percent of its staff in the event of a government shutdown, sending home approximately 40,500 employees, according to a contingency plan released by the agency. An estimated 38,000 staffers will remain on the job for the short term.

The furloughs won't affect people receiving health care through Medicare or Medicaid, officials said.

"In the short term, the Medicare Program will continue largely without disruption during a lapse in appropriations," the contingency plan says, adding that money already has been set aside to continue funding to states for Medicaid services and the Children's Health Insurance Program.

The shutdown also won't affect any medical programs provided by the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, officials added.

"All VA medical facilities and clinics will remain fully operational," the agency said in a shutdown guide sent to its field offices. "The Veterans Health Administration has received an advance appropriation to continue its services without disruption."

In a somewhat ironic twist, a government shutdown would do nothing to halt the rollout of the health exchanges, or marketplaces, a cornerstone of the health-care law. The program that many Republicans are intent on defunding—in exchange for keeping the government operating—will proceed even as other services falter.

"Many of the core parts of the health-care law are funded through mandatory appropriations and wouldn't be affected," HHS official Gary Cohen told the Associated Press. Cohen is director of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services' Center for Consumer Information and Insurance Oversight.

President Barack Obama has echoed those remarks.

"On Tuesday, about 40 million more Americans will be able to finally buy quality, affordable health care, just like anybody else," Obama said. He added that the new health insurance marketplaces "will be open for business on Tuesday no matter what—even if there's a government shutdown. That's a done deal."

People will be able to go to their state health exchange online or over the phone and begin registering for 2014 coverage, even if they live in one of the 34 states in which the federal government either wholly or partially operates the health insurance exchange.

The Centers for Medicaid and Medicare Services (CMS) will continue coordination between Medicaid and state marketplaces, guiding eligible people with low incomes into the program. CMS said it will also continue to perform such health-care industry assessments as insurance rate reviews, which are mandated by the Affordable Care Act.

But, a number of important government-run health-care functions will be disrupted during a shutdown, the HHS contingency plan said. Some of these include:

- The seasonal influenza program operated by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which tracks flu outbreaks across state lines using genetic and molecular analysis. The CDC also will be hampered in its efforts to monitor and combat other infectious diseases, such as tuberculosis, hepatitis and sexually transmitted diseases.
- Routine inspections of food and drug manufacturers and monitoring of imports by the Food and Drug Administration.

- Senior nutrition and elder abuse programs operated by the Administration for Community Living.
- Admission of new patients at the National Institutes of Health's Clinical Center.
- Action on any grants related to medical research, improvement of the health-care system, and monitoring of substance abuse programs.
- Funding for activities related to medical countermeasures against chemical, biological, radiological, nuclear and emerging threats.
- Medical disaster relief to Colorado in response to the recent flooding.

More information: For more on the Affordable Care Act, visit the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Copyright © 2013 HealthDay. All rights reserved.

Citation: Medicare, medicaid would keep running if US government shuts down (2013, September 30) retrieved 2 May 2024 from https://medicalxpress.com/news/2013-09-medicare-medicaid.html

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.