

A scramble to sign up the young by health deadline

February 7 2014, by Julie Pace

David Bransfield, a state outreach coordinator for Young Invincibles, a group which supports President Barack Obama's health care law, right, is seated with Dr. Christopher Riley, left, of Assist DC, as they look to sign up students for health care at the University of the District of Columbia in Washington, Thursday, Jan. 30, 2014. An army of workers and volunteers has fanned out around the country trying to enroll young and healthy people in health insurance now available through Obama's signature law. (AP Photo/Charles Dharapak)

An army of workers and volunteers has fanned out around the country trying to enroll young and healthy people in health insurance now available through President Barack Obama's signature law.

Run largely by groups with close ties to the White House, the on-the-ground effort is based in part on lessons learned from Obama's two presidential bids, which revolutionized the way campaigns tracked and targeted voters.

More than any other group, participation from the so-called young invincibles will be crucial to the health law's success.

The Kaiser Family Foundation estimates that about 40 percent of those who enroll need to be young and healthy to balance the higher costs of insuring older, sicker people.

With less than two months until the sign-up deadline, the Obama administration is lagging behind its goal.

© 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.

Citation: A scramble to sign up the young by health deadline (2014, February 7) retrieved 25 April 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2014-02-scramble-young-health-deadline.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.