

US grants extra time to enroll for health care (Update)

March 26 2014, by Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

This March 25, 2014, photo shows part of the website for HealthCare.gov as photographed in Washington. If you're waiting until the last minute to sign up for coverage under President Barack Obama's health care law, a little extra patience might come in handy. HealthCare.gov, the online portal to taxpayer-subsidized health insurance, runs slowly when compared with major private health insurer websites. That's according to an analysis for The Associated Press by Compuware, a Detroit company that measures website performance. (AP Photo/Jon Elswick)

The Obama administration has announced that people who started applying for health insurance but are not able to finish before the March 31 enrollment deadline will get extra time.

The latest tweak to the rules for President Barack Obama's health care law brought immediate scorn from opposition Republicans committed to its repeal.

The law is the main legislative achievement of President Barack Obama's first term and millions of uninsured Americans getting health care could go a long way toward ensuring his place in American history. But its implementation has been plagued by problems and Republicans have been making its repeal their rallying cry in the campaign leading up to the November elections.

The latest tweak to the rules for the law brought immediate scorn from opposition Republicans.

"The administration has now handed out so many waivers, special favors and exemptions to help Democrats out politically ... it's basically become the legal equivalent of Swiss cheese," Republican Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said Wednesday.

The timing of the administration's announcement late Tuesday also raised concerns about the potential for another round of technology problems such as the ones that paralyzed HealthCare.gov after its Oct. 1 launch.

"We are experiencing a surge in demand and are making sure that we will be ready to help consumers who may be in line by the deadline to complete enrollment, either online or over the phone," Health and Human Services spokesman Aaron Albright said Tuesday night.

Officials say the federal website that serves 36 states is holding up well under the added demand, with more than 1.2 million visits on Tuesday. But independent testing by Compuware has found that the site runs slowly when compared to other health insurance industry websites.

The White House is scrambling to meet a goal of 6 million signed up through new online markets that offer subsidized private health insurance to people without access to coverage on the job.

Officials said the grace period will be available to people on the honor system, meaning applicants will have to attest that special circumstances or complex cases prevented them from finishing by March 31.

It's unclear how long the extension will last. Some have urged the administration to allow until April 15, the tax filing deadline. People who are due tax refunds may be willing to put some of that money toward health care premiums.

The sign-up extension follows other delays, most significantly of the law's requirements that medium- to large-sized businesses provide coverage or face fines.

The White House had signaled last week that a grace period of some sort was in the works. Spokesman Jay Carney said Friday that people in line by the deadline would be able to complete their applications. Administration officials argue that's not extending the deadline. They compare it to the Election Day practice of allowing people to vote if they are in line when the polls close.

The decision to grant extra time was first reported late Tuesday by The Washington Post.

The administration's decision affects the 36 states where the federal government is taking the lead on sign-ups. But the 14 states running their own websites are likely to follow, since some had been pressing for an extension on account of their own technical problems.

© 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.

Citation: US grants extra time to enroll for health care (Update) (2014, March 26) retrieved 26 April 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2014-03-hhs-grants-extra-enroll-health.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.