

Girls' happiness plummets as they reach teenage years, research reveals

October 16 2015

Credit: Petr Kratochvil/public domain

English schoolgirls are less satisfied with their lives than boys and feel more pressure to succeed at school – a report authored by University of Hertfordshire researchers has revealed.

The World Health Organisation collaborative Health Behaviour in School-aged Children-authored (HBSC) report shows as girls hit their teenage years the number who rate their happiness as high dropped from 81 per cent at aged 11 to 55 per cent at 15.

In comparison 74 per cent of 15-year-old boys say they are happy, down from 81 per cent at aged 11.

Dropped

And it appears the number of 15-year-old girls who can be said to be thriving has dropped by 10 percentage points from 2002, with just 55 per cent rating their life satisfaction as high in 2014.

Worryingly nearly three times as many 15-year-old girls as boys said they self-harmed, and girls were more likely to report self-harming on a frequent basis.

Half of 15-year-old girls also said their body is too fat, and as they aged from 11 to 15 they were more likely to feel lonely, less focused and tired than their male counterparts.

Risk

Professor Fiona Brooks, one of the authors of the report and head of adolescent and child health research at the University, said: 'This report tells an important story about young people's health right now in England, traditional risk behaviours are in decline which is great news but what will be of concern to teachers, parents and families are the more negative results on emotional well-being and positive behaviours such as physical activity.'

The Health Behaviour in School-aged Children study for England was led by researchers from the Centre for Research in Primary and Community Care, University of Hertfordshire.

The Department of Health and World Health Organisation-backed report studied 5,335 children at ages 11, 13 and 15 from 48 schools in 2014.

The study takes place every four years and was launched in England in 1997.

Exercise

It also found just 15 per cent of girls and 22 per cent of boys manage to get the recommended 60 minutes of exercise per day.

And roughly a fifth of youngsters reported not getting enough sleep to feel awake and concentrate at school.

More positively levels of drunkenness, smoking and regular alcohol consumption all fell from 2002.

In 2014 just 32 per cent of girls and 29 per cent of boys said they had been drunk 2 or more times – down from 55 per cent in 2002.

And just eight per cent of girls and six per cent of boys smoke weekly – down from 28 per cent of girls and 21 per cent of boys in 2002.

Sexual activity

Rates of sexual activity have also declined with just under 21 per cent of 15 year olds reported having sex compared to 38 per cent in 2002.

Rates of violence have also gone down, with just under 25 per cent of boys reported getting in a fight in the past 12 months, compared to 34 per cent a decade ago.

Jane Ellison, Parliamentary undersecretary of state for Public Health, said: 'This study shows that teenagers today are significantly less likely to smoke, drink excessively or have underage sex than 10 years ago.

'We should welcome the fact that many young people are making much healthier life choices as this will lead to a healthier future for the UK as a whole.

'However, there is much yet to do and we remain vigilant to the pressures young people and especially girls face, and by 2020 we will invest an extra £1.25 billion in children and young people's mental health services.'

Provided by University of Hertfordshire

Citation: Girls' happiness plummets as they reach teenage years, research reveals (2015, October 16) retrieved 2 May 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2015-10-girls-happiness-plummets-teenage-years.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
