

Mental health treatment under the NHS is at extreme risk

January 7 2016, by Charlotte Anscombe

The NHS of 2015 is in danger of being unethical for mental health counsellors to work in, according to a new paper from The University of Nottingham.

In Therapy Today, Dr Gillian Proctor who trains counsellors from The University of Nottingham's School of Education reflects on the predictions she made on the future of the NHS in a paper in 2002 and how the current services are impacting on the treatment of mental health today.

Dr Proctor said: "The privatisation of the NHS has continued by stealth, with the result of increasing bureaucratisation and medicalisation of mental healthcare. All the new money put into mental health care through IAPT (Improving Access to Psychological Therapies) has resulted in patients being treated as numbers to be measured in spurious ways and treated as though counselling was a drug, offered a small dose and then discharged.

'Conveyor-belt services'

"Despite the false rhetoric of increasing choice of therapy for patients, models which prioritise the therapy relationship struggle to fit in such a one-size-fits-all system. Counsellors who respond to patients with distress with humanity and care are being driven out of such conveyor-belt services and patients are dropping out and being left with nothing."

In her paper Dr Proctor identifies that:

- Mental healthcare has moved away from the idea of relationships, and professionals further away from the idea that who and how we are as people matters.
- Healthcare professionals are working towards performance-related pay—and are judged by the numbers of people seen and 'improving' on arbitrary symptom-based scales of mental health, rather than by their ability to respond to personal distress.
- Mental health services are now dominated by IAPT—meaning services are more about structured standardised short term interventions than personalised or longer term therapy.
- The privatisation of the NHS is continuing surreptitiously.
- The UK is still managing to maintain the line that the NHS—is 'free healthcare for all'—but for how long?
- The only way for private companies to deliver better care to patients at a lower cost than the NHS, is by reducing the pay of its employees.
- The pay and employment conditions of NHS jobs have reduced substantially in the last five years.

Dr Proctor adds: "I'm disappointed that my previous predictions which I feared have been surpassed and I'm very disillusioned about the possibility of working as an ethical counsellor and providing a humane service to distressed clients in the NHS."

More information: A full copy of the report can be viewed at www.therapytoday.net/article/s ... 051/the-nhs-in-2015/

Provided by University of Nottingham

Citation: Mental health treatment under the NHS is at extreme risk (2016, January 7) retrieved 5 May 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2016-01-mental-health-treatment-nhs-extreme.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.