

Women in Oregon no longer need Rx for birth control

January 5 2016

(HealthDay)—Oregon has become the first state to allow women to obtain birth control without a doctor's prescription.

The new law was signed last July by Gov. Kate Brown and took effect Jan. 1. California plans to do the same and U.S. senators in Colorado and Washington have both introduced versions of Oregon's new law, according to KOIN television station in Portland.

In Oregon, women 18 and older can go into a pharmacy and complete a special health questionnaire. If everything is in order, the pharmacists will give them a prescription for birth control. Women younger than 18 still require a doctor's prescription, but that requirement will be removed within a few years, according to the news report. A pharmacist can refuse to prescribe birth control for religious reasons, but must refer the patient somewhere else.

"Just having birth control accessible through a pharmacist doesn't mean preventative health care isn't important. That's not what this law is saying," said Alison Edelman, M.D., M.P.H., of the Oregon Health & Science University in Portland, according to KOIN. The new law allows "increased access to women for something that's incredibly safe and a really big need for women," Edelman added.

More information: Health Highlights: Jan. 4, 2016

Copyright © 2016 HealthDay. All rights reserved.

Citation: Women in Oregon no longer need Rx for birth control (2016, January 5) retrieved 27 April 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2016-01-women-oregon-longer-rx-birth.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
