

Study: Long-term care costs continue to rise

May 10 2016, by By Tom Murphy

In this April 14, 2016, file photo, a son holds his mother's hand at her nursing home in Adrian, Mich. Long-term care grew more expensive again in 2016, with the median annual bill for a private nursing home room edging closer to $100,000, according to a survey released Tuesday, May 10, 2016, from Genworth Financial. (AP Photo/Carlos Osorio, File)

Long-term care grew more expensive again this year, with the cost of the priciest option, a private nursing home room, edging closer to $100,000 annually, according to a survey from Genworth Financial.

Americans also are paying more for other care options like home health aides and assisted living communities, while adult day care costs fell slightly compared to 2015, Genworth reported in a study released Tuesday.

Private nursing home rooms now come with a median annual bill of $92,378, an increase of 1.2 percent from last year and nearly 19 percent since 2011. That breaks down to a monthly bill of $7,698.

Genworth Financial Inc. sells long-term care coverage and didn't address that cost in its study, which was based on information from 15,000 long-term care providers.

Coverage costs also are rising, and many people don't understand these expenses until they face them, said Joe Caldwell of the National Council on Aging, which is not connected with the study.

"It's really becoming more and more difficult for the average family ... to even purchase long-term care insurance," said Caldwell, the nonprofit's director of long-term services and support policy.

Medicare doesn't cover long-term stays, so a large swath of people who need that coverage wind up spending down their assets until they qualify for the government's health insurance program for the poor, Medicaid.

There are no cheap options for those without long-term coverage. Semi-private nursing home rooms cost $82,125 annually, a bill that has climbed nearly 17 percent over the past five years, according to Genworth.

Nursing home costs are rising largely because residents are more likely to arrive with chronic conditions like diabetes or emphysema that need more medical attention, said Greg Crist, a spokesman for the American

Health Care Association, the country's largest trade group for nursing homes. He added that the average nursing home resident takes 11 prescription medications.

"They're living longer, they're not necessarily living healthier," he said.

Genworth found that the median annual cost for assisted living communities adds up to $43,539 this year. In-home health aides, who help patients with non-medical tasks like bathing or dressing, cost $46,332 annually, or $3,861 a month.

The median annual cost for adult day care fell $224 to $17,680.

Annually, Genworth found that the cost of everything except an in-home health aide has risen by at least 11 percent since 2011.

© 2016 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.

Citation: Study: Long-term care costs continue to rise (2016, May 10) retrieved 27 April 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2016-05-long-term.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.