

Barn dances bring joy and relief to veterans with PTSD

December 16 2016, by Dylan Lovan

---

In this Tuesday, Nov. 29, 2016 photo, U.S. Army veteran Roosevelt Smith III, center, enjoys time with other veterans and volunteers in an evening of community dance designed for veterans and families who are affected by PTSD, in Louisville, Ky. The environment is built for maximum comfort: lights are kept low for dancers with traumatic brain injuries, the music is cheery without heavy beats and the location is not advertised to provide anxious visitors a sense of security and privacy. The group sessions are kept small, usually less than 30 people (AP Photo/ David Stephenson)

Nothing puts a smile on Roosevelt Smith's face quite like dancing. It helps him forget, for a while, the post-traumatic stress disorder he's had since the Gulf War.

Smith is one of a few dozen veterans with PTSD or traumatic brain injuries who fight depression and anxiety with a group dancing class that gathers at an AmVets post in Louisville, Kentucky.

"It's a way of calming yourself, an outlet so to speak," Smith said as a fiddler and a piano player warmed up behind him. "We have a lot of things that we do as far as prescription drugs, but this right here is the best prescription I've had, (with) no side effects."

The Veterans Administration says between 10 and 20 percent of war veterans going back to the Vietnam era are living with PTSD.

The idea for dancing-as-therapy grew out of a talk Deborah Denenfeld had with a psychiatrist at Fort Knox about a dancing program for active duty military back in 2011. Denenfeld determined that the barn-style dances were best for military members, and she eventually developed the "Dancing Well" program for veterans with PTSD beginning in 2013.

"This traditional dance, you might think of it as barn dance that's been tested by hundreds of years of communities dancing it, is so simple and pure it's a natural for this population," said Denenfeld, who leads the sessions.

In this Tuesday, Nov. 29, 2016 photo, veterans and volunteers participate in Dancing Well, an evening of community dance designed for veterans and families who are affected by PTSD, in Louisville, Ky. The environment is built for maximum comfort: lights are kept low for dancers with traumatic brain injuries, the music is cheery without heavy beats and the location is not advertised to provide anxious visitors a sense of security and privacy. The group sessions are kept small, usually less than 30 people. (AP Photo/ David Stephenson)

The environment is built for maximum comfort. Lights are kept low for dancers with traumatic brain injuries, and the music stays cheery, with no jarring percussion. The location is not advertised, providing anxious visitors with a sense of security and privacy. The groups are kept small and the dances are typically organized into 10 weekly sessions.

There is no shame in this space, where men and women young and old join hands and glide through a series of barn-style dances.

About 25 dancers met this November as Denenfeld guided them through their moves, keeping up a constant pep talk through a wireless microphone.

In this Tuesday, Nov. 29, 2016 photo, veterans and volunteers participate in Dancing Well, an evening of community dance designed for veterans and families who are affected by PTSD, in Louisville, Ky. The environment is built for maximum comfort: lights are kept low for dancers with traumatic brain injuries, the music is cheery without heavy beats and the location is not advertised to provide anxious visitors a sense of security and privacy. The group sessions are kept small, usually less than 30 people. (AP Photo/ David Stephenson)

Darlene Messler, an Army veteran, was sidelined by a foot injury, but came anyway, just to watch with her crutches alongside her.

"It takes me back to my childhood, in grade school, doing square-dancing," Messler said. She suffers from PTSD due to sexual trauma during her time in the military in the 1970s, but "when I'm here, I don't have to worry about that. I just have fun, we're all just here as a family and just having fun."

Denenfeld said she knows of only one other comparable program, the San Diego-based Soldiers Who Salsa, which offers classes in Southern California and a few other states. She hopes the idea will spread, and is working to train volunteers to run their own classes. A major roadblock, she says, is her need for private donations to cover the cost of liability insurance.

In this Tuesday, Nov. 29, 2016 photo, Deborah Denenfeld, director of Dancing Well, leads veterans and volunteers in an evening of community dance designed for veterans and families who are affected by PTSD, in Louisville, Ky. The environment is built for maximum comfort: lights are kept low for dancers with traumatic brain injuries, the music is cheery without heavy beats and the location is not advertised to provide anxious visitors a sense of security and privacy. The group sessions are kept small, usually less than 30 people. (AP Photo/ David Stephenson)

HFM TBA **In this Tuesday, Nov. 29, 2016 photo, a red yarn bracelet, worn on the right wrist, is a visual aid for veterans and volunteers to help them remember left from right during an evening of community dance designed for veterans and families who are affected by PTSD, in Louisville, Ky. The environment is built for maximum comfort: lights are kept low for dancers with traumatic brain injuries, the music is cheery without heavy beats and the location is not advertised to provide anxious visitors a sense of security and privacy. The group sessions are kept small, usually less than 30 people. (AP Photo/ David Stephenson)

© 2016 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.

Citation: Barn dances bring joy and relief to veterans with PTSD (2016, December 16) retrieved 3 May 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2016-12-barn-joy-relief-veterans-ptsd.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.