

Relationship success tied not to joking but shared sense of humor, researcher says

February 9 2017

Credit: University of Kansas

Here's a relationship tip as Valentine's Day approaches: Study after study affirms that people want a mate with a sense of humor. But it's less about you being a jokester than about finding a style of humor that makes you both laugh.

That's what Jeffrey Hall, University of Kansas associate professor of communication studies, has concluded in an article to be published in the journal Personal Relationships. Hall surveyed the findings of 39 studies, involving more than 15,000 participants, on the importance of humor in relationships.

"People say they want a sense of humor in a mate, but that's a broad concept," Hall said. "That people think you are funny or you can make a joke out of anything is not strongly related to relationship satisfaction.

What is strongly related to relationship satisfaction is the humor that couples create together.

"Say you and your partner share a quirky sense of humor, but romantic comedies or sit-coms do nothing for either of you. So it's not that any style or a sense of humor is any better or worse. What matters is that you both see quirky humor as hysterical. If you share a sense of what's funny, it affirms you and affirms your relationship through laughter."

In the article "Humor in Romantic Relationships, a Meta-Analysis," Hall looks back on 30 years' worth of studies on the topic, concluding that "playfulness between romantic partners is a crucial component in bonding and establishing relational security" and that laughter, "particularly shared laughter, is an important indicator of romantic attraction between potential mates."

Hall cautions that research warns a mate not to make his or her partner the butt of a joke.

"Having an aggressive sense of humor is a bad sign for the relationship in general, but it is worse if the style of humor is used in the relationship," Hall said. "If you think that your partner tells mean-spirited jokes, then it's likely you've seen that firsthand in your relationship."

The bottom line, Hall says: "It's good to have humor. It's better to see it in your partner. And it's best to share it."

"It's not about being a great comedian, but finding what's funny in the everyday and enjoying it together, whether that's 'The Simpsons' or repeating funny things your kids say or The New Yorker cartoons or relishing in the absurdity of life. It is most important you do it together."

Provided by University of Kansas

Citation: Relationship success tied not to joking but shared sense of humor, researcher says
(2017, February 9) retrieved 1 May 2024 from

<https://medicalxpress.com/news/2017-02-relationship-success-tied-humor.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
--