

Double-edged health care experience for endometriosis

May 24 2017

---

(HealthDay)—For women with endometriosis, the health care experience is double-edged, with both a destructive and constructive side, according to a study published online May 11 in the Journal of Clinical Nursing.

Hanna Grundström, R.N.M., from Vrinnevi Hospital in Norrköping, Sweden, and colleagues interviewed nine women (aged 23 to 55 years) with a laparoscopy-confirmed diagnosis of endometriosis to identify and describe their experience during health care encounters. The data were analyzed using the interpretive phenomenological approach.

The researchers identified two themes in the interview transcripts: being treated with ignorance and being acknowledged. From these themes, the double-edged experience of health care encounters emerged, with the experience involving contradictory feelings of being destructive or constructive. Being ignored and feeling exposed and not believed characterized the destructive side, while the constructive side made women feel acknowledged and confirmed, enhancing their self-esteem.

"The new and important aspects of the findings are that the experience of health care encounters is for the first time expressed as double-edged: both destructive and constructive," the authors write. "The experience was of specific importance as it affected the women's perceptions of themselves and of their bodies."

More information: Abstract
Full Text \(subscription or payment may be required\)

Copyright © 2017 HealthDay. All rights reserved.

Citation: Double-edged health care experience for endometriosis (2017, May 24) retrieved 18 April 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2017-05-double-edged-health-endometriosis.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.