

Amsterdam's red light district without a condom? 'Not for a million!'

July 22 2018

"If they don't agree to using a condom, I kick them out," says Foxy Angel, a 47-year-old platinum blonde sexworker, sporting some fearsome tattoos, in Amsterdam's notorious red light district.

The Netherlands' biggest city is almost synonymous with the sexshops, brothels and prostitutes huddled in the narrow streets close to the main train station, drawing perhaps even more tourists than they do clientele.

Some of the city's quaint narrow houses serve as brothels with their characteristic bay windows on the ground floor, where the sexworkers sit under red neon lights awaiting the next customer.

It is no coincidence that the organisers of this year's International AIDS Conference, which starts on Monday, chose to hold it in Europe's city of sin.

"When we chose Amsterdam, it was very much with the idea of shining a light on the most vulnerable people exposed to HIV," the human immunodeficiency virus that causes AIDS, says Linda-Gail Bekker, president of the International AIDS Society.

"If we pay no attention to these people, then we will lose the fight against AIDS," she told AFP on a visit to the red light district on Saturday.

Free HIV tests

The sexworkers did not expect some of the world's leading scientists and doctors to traipse through the carpeted corridors and gloomily lit bedrooms of the brothels to see for themselves the risks faced by those who ply "the oldest profession in the world".

"I never have sex without condoms and I go for tests four times a year for STDs (sexually transmitted diseases) and HIV," says Foxy Angel, sitting in a red velvet armchair and eating a sandwich for lunch.

After more than 30 years of research, no cure or vaccine has been found for HIV, which has infected around 80 million people worldwide since the start of the epidemic in the 1980s.

Among those infected are colleagues of Foxy Angel and Elsa, the young sexworker in the next window. It's been a long time since HIV was taboo here.

"I'm not scared at all. Some of my friends are HIV-positive and still carry on working. It's possible nowadays," says the 25-year-old American, referring to the progress medicine has made in treating those infected with the virus.

Prostitution was legalised in the Netherlands in 2000 and sexworkers can register with the local chamber of commerce and pay income tax.

Around 7,000 people work in the paid-sex sector in Amsterdam, with around 75 percent of them coming from low-income countries, particularly eastern Europe, according to official figures.

Staying vigilant

Describing herself as "married and polyandrous," Elsa says she has been a sexworker since the age of 17.

The window where she sits looks out onto one of Amsterdam's many canals and is opposite the brothel where she first worked when she arrived in the Netherlands, having fled the many restrictions on her trade in the United States.

Like Foxy Angel, Elsa goes for HIV tests several times a year at a centre financed by the city near their workplace.

"I'm very careful, I use condoms. But the tests are free, so I take advantage of them," says the young woman, dressed in a pink top and black leggings.

If mores have changed since the arrival of AIDS, and the condom has been "democratised", the sexworkers insist they must remain vigilant to the risk of infection.

"Some men try to pull the condom off during sex. If that happens, it's the end of the session, immediately," says Foxy Angel, who worked as a fashion saleswoman before becoming a prostitute 15 years ago.

"I'd never accept that. Not for a million!" she says.

© 2018 AFP

Citation: Amsterdam's red light district without a condom? 'Not for a million!' (2018, July 22) retrieved 3 May 2024 from

<https://medicalxpress.com/news/2018-07-amsterdam-red-district-condom-million.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
--