

Lifestyle changes helped new dad shed nearly 50 pounds

January 3 2019

Erik Minaya at the 2018 Capital City River Run in Lansing, Michigan. Photo courtesy: Erik Minaya

It happens every January. Gyms fill with people who've committed to New Year's resolutions involving health and fitness. While making a resolution is an important first step, developing new habits is the key to long-term success, said Erik Minaya, who has maintained significant weight loss for several years.

Minaya started to put on the pounds during his freshman year in college. His body mass index continued to creep up throughout his college years and beyond, as he began working at a stressful job with a one-hour commute each way. By age 24, he tipped the scale at nearly 265 pounds.

"The bad habits compounded over the years," said the 30-year-old from Michigan.

Sugary drinks and fast food were his biggest vices. Drive-in dinners were easier and cheaper than healthy options, and the jolt of sugar and fat temporarily alleviated some of the stress after working at a job he didn't enjoy. By 2 p.m. nearly every afternoon, Minaya would crash.

"I wasn't motivated to do much," he said. "And good luck getting me to go out and do anything physical."

Minaya's family has a history of elevated blood pressure and cholesterol, and diabetes. Worried that he was headed down the same path, Minaya made drastic lifestyle changes in 2013.

He cut out fast food, replacing it with lower-carb offerings that he prepared himself. He swapped regular soda for diet; a few months later, he switched to water.

"It wasn't a crash diet," Minaya said. "I was trying to make actual life changes."

People should limit their intake of added sugars to no more than half of their daily "discretionary calories," suggests the American Heart Association. For most men, that figure is 150 calories per day; for most women, it's 100 calories. But one 12-ounce can of most sugary sodas will typically contain about 150 calories, and some have even more.

The changes Minaya made had an almost immediate impact.

He lost 15 pounds during the first year. And after accepting a new job with a shorter commute and an onsite gym, he lost 15 more pounds. Since then, he has continued to lose weight more slowly – nearly 50 pounds total so far. He has more energy and focus.

"I have an almost heightened sense of awareness," he said.

Minaya recently finished a 5K run (3.1 miles) in less than 30 minutes "which is slow for me," he said. He also lifts weights and plays golf, tennis and soccer. He persuaded his company, Delta Dental of Michigan, to put up a basketball hoop in the parking lot.

"It's good to have a goal and go for it," Minaya said. "I like being driven to achieve something."

Minaya is not shy about sharing his experience. He recently encouraged a friend to adopt the same diet, which led the friend to lose 30 pounds. He also told his story at an event hosted by Delta Dental, the AHA and the Grand Rapids Children's Museum as a part of the Rethink Your Drink campaign.

With a newborn at home, Minaya said he has succumbed to old temptations and put on a few pounds, but he is determined to get back on track, not only for his sake but also for the sake of his daughter, Elsie.

"My wife, Jamie, and I want to make better choices for her sake," he said. "I'll never have six-pack abs, but what I care about is good health."

Copyright is owned or held by the American Heart Association, Inc., and all rights are reserved. If you have questions or comments about this story, please email editor@heart.org.

Citation: Lifestyle changes helped new dad shed nearly 50 pounds (2019, January 3) retrieved 11 May 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2019-01-lifestyle-dad-pounds.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.