

COVID-19: New daily routines for medications

April 24 2020, by Mayo Clinic News Network

---

Credit: CC0 Public Domain

Schedules and routines are being affected as people stay-at-home during the COVID-19 pandemic.

For instance, it might be difficult to stay on track with taking medications when you're not doing the things you usually do, according to Dr. Robert Bright, a Mayo Clinic psychiatrist.

Dr. Bright says it's especially important for people who have mental health issues, such as anxiety or depression, to keep up with their medicine. He says when you've lost that routine, it can be easy to slip off schedule.

"I would encourage people to establish a new routine and a new schedule," says Dr. Bright. "What time are you now getting up? Are you going to bed at a different time? When are you eating? And what are you doing with those in-between hours at home?"

"Set a reminder on your smartphone, or someplace in your house, or post sticky notes to tie those medications to something else you're doing, to remind you," Dr. Bright says. "Put the prescription bottle next to your toothbrush, so when you get up in the morning and go to bed at night, you see the medicine right there."

When you are anxious or depressed, Dr. Bright says, it's important to do the opposite of what you're feeling up to, to take care of yourself. He says don't withdraw and go to bed.

"With all that's happening, it can be easy to drift emotionally and psychologically into thinking, "I don't really need the medication, or I don't feel like it, or it's so overwhelming I just can't do this today,"" says Dr. Bright.

He also warns that running out of medication is a problem and people might not have the emotional energy to deal with getting a refill.

"It's so important to fight against all this," he says. "This is a time of vulnerability, and it's not a time to stop medications. This is a time to be really consistent."

Dr. Bright adds that it's also a time to recognize when you might need help. He encourages you to call for help, especially if you're already established with a mental health provider. If you're really struggling, reach out to the National Suicide Prevention Lifeline, where you can call and talk to somebody. He or she can provide resources and connect you to counseling.

Finally, Dr. Bright emphasizes that people are not alone. He says people don't struggle by themselves.

"It's so important to reach out to the people who care about you and who you care about, to contact your mental health provider, a counselor, or a counseling hotline," he says. "It can be isolating, but you can be separated without being isolated."

©2020 Mayo Foundation for Medical Education and Research
Distributed by Tribune Content Agency, LLC.

Citation: COVID-19: New daily routines for medications (2020, April 24) retrieved 15 June 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2020-04-covid-daily-routines-medications.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
--