

In New York, Omicron revives dark memories of a nightmarish 2020

December 19 2021, by Diane Desobeau, With Nicolas Revise

---

The arrival of the Omicron variant of Covid-19 in New York had people lining up for testing on December 17, 2021.

With restaurants in Brooklyn closing in rapid succession and lines at COVID-19 test centers swelling by the day, fears are growing in New York of a return to the nightmare of 2020, when the city was the global epicenter of the pandemic.

On Saturday, New York state announced a record number of daily cases for the second day in a row with almost 22,000 positive results.

In Brooklyn's Greenpoint neighborhood alone, more than a dozen bars and restaurants have had to close temporarily amid a recent surge in infections among their workers and patrons.

Near popular McCarren Park, around 30 people were lined up at a medical van offering rapid tests.

And at 30 Rockefeller Plaza in Manhattan, popular sketch television show "Saturday Night Live" announced it would not film in front of a live audience, and have a limited cast and crew. Its musical guest Charli XCX said she would no longer perform.

"It feels very reminiscent of March 2020," said Spencer Reiter, a 27-year-old Brooklyn resident who works in finance.

He and his friend Katie Connolly, a student who is also 27, had come to be tested after friends tested positive.

"Seeing these lines... it's kind of back to where we began," Reiter said.

Connolly concurred, saying, "It's definitely eerie."

Empty streets

A man undergoes a rapid Covid-19 test at a medical van in New York on December 17, 2021.

The first wave of the pandemic brought New York to its knees in the spring of 2020.

The megalopolis of 8.5 million people, long known as "the city that never sleeps," felt almost deserted for weeks, its empty streets resembling something from a science fiction movie about a post-apocalyptic world.

The only sound heard in Manhattan's broad avenues seemed to be the stress-inducing wail of ambulance sirens, while hospitals operated beyond capacity and morgues were forced to bring in refrigerated trucks to handle the huge influx of COVID victims.

The disease has claimed at least 34,000 lives in New York City since spring 2020, and the city—especially Manhattan—has never completely regained its legendary glitter and energy of pre-COVID days.

'Very scary'

"We are actually in the beginning again, or maybe even worse," said Jolanta Czerlanis, a 54-year-old Brooklyn resident. She had come for testing after feeling possible COVID symptoms.

"It's very scary," added Czerlanis, who works in catering. "We were hoping that it's going to get better."

The startlingly rapid spread of the COVID-19 Omicron variant has raised grave concern across the US.

President Joe Biden on Thursday predicted a "winter of severe illness and death" for the unvaccinated.

A view of the Manhattan skyline from across the East River on December 14, 2021.

The number of new daily cases nationwide stood at 86,000 on December 1; by December 14, it had soared to 117,000, a 36 percent increase in two weeks.

The US already leads the world in the most grim of statistics. On Tuesday it surpassed 800,000 COVID deaths, according data compiled by Johns Hopkins University.

'Omicron happened'

What accounts for the surge?

"Omicron happened," New York Mayor Bill de Blasio said recently on CNN.

"And we got to be honest about the fact that it's moving very fast and we have to move faster," he added, speaking just weeks before he steps aside to make way for his elected successor, Eric Adams.

De Blasio has made vaccination mandatory for all city employees and, effective December 27, for the 184,000 companies and businesses in the city's huge private sector. It remains unclear, however, whether Adams will enforce that requirement once he takes power.

In this normally festive holiday season, when New York traditionally welcomes an influx of tourists—and their money—a sense of panic has gripped the iconic theaters and music halls of Broadway as positive cases among performers and backstage workers have forced more and more cancellations.

People line up for rapid Covid-19 tests in New York on December 17, 2021.

Panic on Broadway

Radio City Music Hall late Friday announced it was canceling the four remaining Christmas shows starring its famed "Rockette" dancers due to "increasing challenges from the pandemic."

As for the multi-award-winning musical "Hamilton," it was canceled without warning Thursday night.

"We literally flew in just to see 'Hamilton' one day only," said Myron Abston, who had traveled from Michigan with his wife Dara Abston.

"We got here early this morning and the show is canceled," he glumly told AFP.

Back in Brooklyn, Edouard Massih's Lebanese grocery and catering business remain open for now.

But he said he fears Omicron's arrival will provoke a new exodus of more affluent New Yorkers to the posh suburbs north of the city, just as happened in 2020—leaving Manhattan, again, feeling like a ghost town.

© 2021 AFP

Citation: In New York, Omicron revives dark memories of a nightmarish 2020 (2021, December 19) retrieved 23 April 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2021-12-york-omicron-revives-dark-memories.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.