

Video: How to know if your teen needs mental health support

May 30 2022, by Deb Balzer

Credit: Pixabay/CC0 Public Domain

Teenagers are experiencing higher rates of mental health issues during the pandemic.

Dr. Marcie Billings, a Mayo Clinic pediatrician, says 1 in 5 youth will have a mental health issue in their teen years.

"That includes things like depression, anxiety, and one of the ones that I think we were a bit surprised about would be eating disorders," says Dr. Billings.

She says the pandemic created a challenging and confusing world for many teens.

"That's their time to start to be independent and start to exert some control over their own lives," she says. "And that was taken away in a way that we had never experienced before."

If you are concerned about your teen, don't hesitate to seek help.

"Whether it be that you feel they're depressed, or anxious, or maybe suffering from an eating disorder, reaching out to your health care provider is the great first step," Dr. Billings says.

Here's what to watch for:

- Changes in activity level.
- More sleep.
- Isolation.
- Personality changes.
- Eating habits.

"There are great ways that we can treat all mental health illnesses—depression, anxiety, eating disorders—but we must have that first step of connecting," Dr. Billing says.

Provided by Mayo Clinic

Citation: Video: How to know if your teen needs mental health support (2022, May 30) retrieved 2 May 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2022-05-video-teen-mental-health.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.