

New psychology research suggests your favorite songs reveal your attachment style

November 11 2022

Credit: Unsplash/CC0 Public Domain

What does having a particular artist on repeat tell us about how to—or how not to—navigate our romantic lives, friendships and family ties? Whether it's Adele or The Weeknd on your go-to playlist, the lyrics can say a lot about you, and it's all related to attachment styles, or how people typically think, feel and act in relationships.

"I'm interested in the role music plays in people's lives. Since humans started making music tens of thousands of years ago, songs across cultures have always focused on relationships—getting into one, maintaining one or breaking up—so I wondered, do people listen to music that mirrors their experiences in relationships?" says Ravin Alaei, who graduated with a Ph.D. from the Department of Psychology in the Faculty of Arts & Science in 2019.

In a new study published in the journal Personal Relationships, Alaei and Department of Psychology professors, Geoff Macdonald and Nicholas Rule, found that people's individual attachment styles correspond with the lyrics of their favorite songs. In other words, we tend to return to the tunes that spell out what we're going through in a relationship, for better or for worse.

"Lyrics matter, so pay attention to them," says Alaei, who is also a physician who earned his MD at McMaster University. "The lyrics of your favorite songs about relationships may help validate your thoughts and feelings but may also reveal things about your experiences of relationships that you might not have realized—something that you're going through repeatedly, that you keep coming up against."

First, a refresher on attachment styles, which can roughly be considered as four categories, says Alaei.

- Anxiously attached people worry about being rejected and seek a lot of reassurance about their relationships.
- On the other hand, avoidantly attached people respond to their negative expectations of relationships by closing off emotions and intimacy in favor of independence.

- People with a mixed attachment style have confused expectations, fluctuating between clingy and cold.
- Lastly, secure people have optimistic outlooks on relationships, and are open communicators and trust their partners.

"We asked about 570 people to tell us their favorite songs, and then coded the nearly 7,000 songs for the attachment style that their lyrics expressed. In turn, we consistently found that avoidantly attached people prefer music with avoidant lyrics," says Alaei. "I expected to see a clear relationship between anxiously attached people and anxious songs because they are the most emotional, but surprisingly, this was the most tenuous result."

This strong avoidant connection is reflected not only on an individual level, but on a societal one as well. In a second study, the researchers coded over 800 Billboard number-one hits from 1946 to 2015 for their attachment themes and found that lyrics have become more avoidant and less secure over time.

"Popular music lyrics are running parallel to sociological trends of social disconnection—people valuing independence over reliance on others, and feeling more isolated," says Alaei.

If we're listening to music that reflects our relationships back at us, is that helping or hindering our relationship skills? Alaei says this is the next step in the research.

Take Adele's discography for example, which Alaei says tips the scale towards anxiously attached themes and was popular among participants. "Someone Like You" appeared on many playlists, with the refrain: "I hate to turn up out of the blue uninvited / But I couldn't stay away, I couldn't fight it / I had hoped you'd see my face and that you'd be reminded / That for me it isn't over."

If someone is an anxiously attached person, will listening to "Someone Like You" on repeat cause more harm than good? According to Alaei, it all starts with self-awareness of your own attachment style.

"As an anxious person, you should recognize that you're vulnerable to a negative feedback loop, and your emotions snowballing," says Alaei.

"Music can be a very powerful exacerbator of that because it can stimulate deep emotions and memories, ultimately reinforcing your worries."

Adele fans may be having very different relationship experiences compared to those listening to The Weeknd's "Heartless." With lyrics like "Tryna be a better man but I'm heartless / Never be a wedding plan for the heartless / Low life for life 'cause I'm heartless," it's a prime example of an avoidant song, says Alaei.

His advice: "Listen to the song a few times to help you process what you're going through and express your thoughts and feelings. You can decide whether listening to songs that reflect your experiences back at you is either helping you or reinforcing destructive behaviors for yourself. At some point, you may find it more productive to listen to music that provides a sense of security."

A popular throwback among participants was Sonny & Cher's "I Got You Babe": "Then put your little hand in mine / There ain't no hill or mountain we can't climb."

"It's pretty much a manual on how to be securely attached," says Alaei.

What do your favorite songs about relationships reveal about your attachment style? Here are some of the tunes that research participants chose for their playlists:

Avoidant songs:

- Beyoncé, Irreplaceable
- Chris Brown, Say Goodbye
- N'Sync, Bye Bye Bye
- Michael Jackson, Billie Jean
- TLC, Scrubs
- Rihanna, Take a Bow
- The Weeknd, The Hills; Heartless

Anxious songs:

- Adele, Someone Like You
- The Police, Every Breath You Take
- Miley Cyrus, Wrecking Ball
- Adele, Hello
- U2, One
- Seether, Broken
- No Doubt, Don't Speak
- Bruno Mars, When I Was Your Man
- Drake, Hotline Bling

Secure songs:

- Sonny & Cher, I Got You Babe
- Whitney Houston, I Will Always Love You
- The Beatles, Love Me Do
- Ed Sheeran, Thinking Out Loud
- Plain White Ts, I Love You
- John Legend, All of Me
- Michael Bublé, Haven't Met You Yet
- Beach Boys, Wouldn't It Be Nice
- Bryan Adams, (Everything I Do) I Do It for You

- Etta James, At Last
- Justin Bieber, Holy

Anxious-Avoidant (mixed) songs:

- Carrie Underwood, Before He Cheats
- Gotye, Somebody that I Used to Know
- Taylor Swift, Bad Blood
- Sam Smith, I'm Not the Only One
- Ne Yo, So Sick
- Bonnie Raitt, I Can't Make You Love Me
- Adele, Rolling in the Deep
- Rihanna ft. Drake, Work
- Eminem ft. Rihanna, Love the Way You Lie

More information: Ravin Alaei et al, Individuals' favorite songs' lyrics reflect their attachment style, Personal Relationships (2022). DOI: 10.1111/per.12448

Provided by University of Toronto

Citation: New psychology research suggests your favorite songs reveal your attachment style (2022, November 11) retrieved 27 April 2024 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2022-11-psychology-favorite-songs-reveal-style.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.