The Consumer Product Safety Commission has announced the recall of more than 10,000 children's robes, as well as thousands of children's pajamas and lounge pants for potential fire risk.

All of the 100% polyester children's robes were sold on Amazon.com between August 2020 through August 2022 and were recalled because the robes fail to meet the federal flammability standards for children's sleepwear, posing a risk of burn injuries to children, the agency said.

Also recalled for potential fire risk: more than 5,000 pairs of children's cotton pajamas sold online and at various children's boutiques, and about 1,960 children's lounge pants sold online at children's product stores nationwide.

No injuries have been reported involving the recalled clothing, the agency said. Consumers should not let their children wear the clothing and can contact the maker or importer for a refund. In many cases, Amazon.com or the company is contacting shoppers who bought the robes.

What types of children's robes are being recalled for fire risk?

About 5,000 children's robes imported by ChildLikeMe of Norton, Ohio, and sold only at Amazon.com from June 2021- August 2022 for $11-$17.
