

Syrian medical students study German in hopes of move abroad

March 15 2023, by Maher al-Mounes

German classes have proliferated in recent years in Syria where the vast majority of foreign language students had until recently opted for English or French.

His medical studies in Syria keep Mohammed Shasho busy enough but whenever he can he also pores over German vocabulary and grammar points in hopes of a move to Europe.

Like many youngsters in the war-ravaged country, he dreams of joining the almost one million Syrians already in Germany to advance his education and perhaps find work there.

"German is very difficult to learn, especially because it is not taught by native speakers in Syria," said the 23-year-old who regularly studies German textbooks and video tutorials.

The effort will be "worth it... once I set foot in Germany", Shasho told AFP in the quiet courtyard of a Damascus health clinic where he volunteers.

German classes have proliferated in recent years in Syria where the vast majority of foreign language students had until recently opted for English or French.

Germany has become a coveted destination for aspiring Syrian doctors who want to study and work away from their homeland, ravaged by conflict and a crushing economic crisis.

Since the war began in 2011, dozens of new German language centres have sprung up in Syria's government-controlled areas, catering to new interest.

While Syrians have a hard time obtaining visas for many countries, medical students and doctors can have an easier time if their destination is looking for skilled health workers.

But for Germany, Shasho and others like him must first be able to demonstrate an advanced language level.

Since the Syrian war broke out in 2011, dozens of new German language centres have sprung up in the country's government-controlled areas.

Soaring demand

He and his friend Jaafar Mustafa, also 23, both sixth-year medical students at Damascus University, revised together to improve their language skills during a break at the clinic.

Germany is "the easiest and safest destination" for Syrians, said Mustafa, adding that qualifications from the country were highly regarded.

"There is a big Syrian community there, so I will not feel alienated," he told AFP. "All of my friends have either travelled, are preparing to travel, or are thinking about it."

Years of devastating conflict have forced around half of Syria's pre-war population from their homes. Millions have fled to neighbouring countries or to Europe.

Some 924,000 Syrians now live in Germany compared with around 118,000 at the end of 2014, according to the German office for migration and refugees.

At the Arabic Centre in Damascus—one of the oldest foreign language institutes in the Syrian capital—director Abdullah Saleh said students were mainly interested in learning English and French until around 2013.

Mohammed Shasho (L) and Jaafar Mustafa test the blood pressure of a patient at a medical centre in Damascus.

Before the war, "the Goethe Institute in Damascus was the only institution specialised in teaching German", Saleh told AFP, but today "there are more than 80 centres" teaching the language.

Last year, more than 1,000 people registered to learn German at Saleh's institute, 70 percent of them medical students or professionals.

'Alarm bells'

Teacher Omar Fattouh, a graduate in German literature at Damascus University, wrote points on a whiteboard at the institute while a group of students, many of them women, followed his class.

He said he now teaches around 100 students a day at several language schools in the capital.

Most pupils are "seeking family reunification" in Germany or are "university students—mostly studying medicine", Fattouh said.

Around 5,400 Syrian physicians were working in Germany in 2021, topping the list of foreign practitioners ahead of Romanians, Greeks and Austrians, according to the German Medical Association.

About 5,400 Syrian physicians were working in Germany in 2021, topping the list of foreign practitioners ahead of Romanians, Greeks and Austrians.

Syrian officials and physicians have expressed concern about the medical brain drain, with education ministry official Fadia Deeb admitting that the exit of doctors is "a reality".

Syria is experiencing a shortage of oncologists, radiologists, anaesthetists and physiotherapists, she told local radio in May last year, blaming the country's economic crisis.

Nabugh al-Awa, a professor and former dean of medicine at Damascus University, said students now started learning German in their first years of university.

"This raises alarm bells because it's the first sign that they are preparing to leave," said the 69-year-old, who has been teaching for three decades.

He expressed disappointment at seeing many from the next generation of doctors and nurses go abroad.

"It saddens me that we are losing our students, our children, who were supposed to follow in our footsteps," he said.

© 2023 AFP

Citation: Syrian medical students study German in hopes of move abroad (2023, March 15) retrieved 4 May 2024 from

<https://medicalxpress.com/news/2023-03-syrian-medical-students-german.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
--