On Our Sleeves survey reveals many parents need support in starting mental health conversations with children
27 April 2022

"We know that conversation is one of the simplest, most effective ways to make an impact, break stigma and give kids a voice when it comes to their mental health," said Ariana Hoet, Ph.D., clinical director of On Our Sleeves and a pediatric psychologist at Nationwide Children's Hospital. "Our research shows that parents know this, too and they’ve shared that they need additional support in starting and maintaining these important mental health conversations."

The national survey from On Our Sleeves, powered by behavioral health experts at Nationwide Children's, found that:

- The vast majority of parents of kids under 18 (93%) say it is important for parents and caregivers to talk to their children about mental health.
- More than half of parents of kids under 18 (59%) need help knowing how to start the conversation around mental health with their children.
- Less than half of Americans (43%) say their family talked about mental health openly when they were growing up.

To help parents, caregivers and educators take the first step, On Our Sleeves has launched Operation: Conversation, a campaign to encourage adults to sit down with the children in their lives to start—and most importantly continue—the conversation to support mental health. Allowing children to have a regular, open space to share their thoughts, feelings and emotions can increase the likelihood that parents and caregivers will notice when their children need support with a mental health concern.

As part of Operation: Conversation, experts from On Our Sleeves are offering parents advice for kickstarting conversations, including:

- Set the stage. The work begins before you even start the conversation. If your family creates a daily habit of checking in and talking with each other, it will make conversations about their mental health or concerns easier.

- Ask open-ended questions. These conversations can include all kinds of topics, not just emotions or behaviors. Remember, your goal is to create the habit of feeling comfortable sharing with you.

- Find the right time for difficult conversations. Pick a time when everyone is calm and emotions are not high. Ask permission to start the conversation and if your child is not ready, ask them when a good time would be. Make sure you’re in a private area with low interruptions.

"After more than two years living through a global pandemic that has been difficult on children's mental health, these conversations are more important than ever," Dr. Hoet added. "On Our Sleeves is here to support adults on how to create an environment where children in their lives feel comfortable coming to them and talking about their day to day or any obstacles that come up."

Operation: Conversation features free conversation starters, tip sheets and educational resources to open the lines of communication between caregivers and children. It also shows caregivers how to react to conversations in a positive way that won't lead children to shut down, feel worse or not be open to talking in the future.

Survey Method:

This survey was conducted online within the United States by The Harris Poll on behalf of On Our Sleeves from April 5-7, 2022 among 2,063 U.S. adults ages 18 and older, among whom 686 are parents of kids under 18. The sampling precision of Harris online polls is measured by using a Bayesian credible interval. For this study, the sample data is accurate to within + 2.8 percentage points using a 95% confidence level.

More information: For more information and resources to start conversations with children that promote mental wellbeing, visit OnOurSleeves.org.

Provided by Nationwide Children's Hospital